

ARTIST'S LOFT BERGEN / LAFAYETTE

Installation artist Lisa Ariotti creates her numerous paintings in a spacious multilevel loft that was once an old factory building. A rustic structure, it's one of Jersey City's few loft conversions where the interiors remain raw.

This feature allows artists to create unique environments well suited to their craft.

Musicians can build interior stages, sculptors have high ceilings, even the internal corridors function as gallery space for resident photographers and painters alike.

The building is located within eyeshot of the Statue of Liberty. A sight she says continually inspires her. "Most of my Italian family immigrated to the United States via Ellis Island. So it's a privilege for me to pursue my dreams as an artist, the Statue reminds me of that everyday."

For the past decade she has refined her unique ink and brush work technique and has been commissioned by modern architects, designers and collectors as well as published both nationally and internationally.

"Creating large scale works of art requires large scale studio space and finding an unfinished loft so close to New York City has been a blessing both for life and art."
